Coffee's test results have come back!

Last night, Coffee's test results came back for the 5th time of confirmation. This means that any results from this 5th test would show exactly why Coffee has been hiding under blankets. However, the results may seem underwhelming when you read them. North, a multi species behaviorist announced to the public that Coffee was hiding under blankets because he was a little bit scared of Harvey when Harvey was batting at North. Harvey was aggressive, but why was Coffee scared? North says that Coffee was afraid that Harvey would start to bat at him, too. Coffee really wants to be loved by Harvey, but he is intimidated by Harvey's swipes sometimes.

In the image on the page above, Harvey is laying a paw on Coffee's chubby foreleg. After this, Coffee seemed not to want to hide under blankets, at least for a little while. It seemed that Coffee became more comfortable when Harvey became gentle and caring. However, when Harvey got mad at North for eating all of the waffles he made, Coffee dove under a blanket when Harvey gave North a kick. North has come to the conclusion that because Harvey is annoyed and mad more often, Coffee is becoming more and more scared and more and more prone to hide under blankets. North is trying to get Harvey to calm down more sometimes, for Coffee's sake.

In the image on the right, North is trying to help Harvey calm down more by snuggling with him after a fight. Harvey seemed to calm down more, which pleased North. If Harvey could learn to stay calm more, Coffee's situation would get better. Harvey, on the other hand, is doing his best by calling Makenna whenever he gets annoyed. Makenna has worked as a therapy cat, so she could get Harvey to fall asleep over the phone, let alone calm him down.

“I calm down by eating a cabbage leaf by leaf, and then when I am done, I eat the stem. This is very calming.”

Other cats are offering ideas about how to calm down faster. Harvey is feeling good, and he is also trying to interact with Coffee more. Naps with Coffee, eating with Coffee, and even the occasional bedtime story. Unfortunately, whenever Harvey forgets to control his angry emotions, Coffee jumps underneath all of the blankets. Harvey tried to fix this by removing all of the blankets from the cupboard, but that made Coffee jump out of one cupboard and into another. Harvey is working hard to try to help Coffee, along with North and other cats. However, this will take work.
