
CATS ILLUSTRATED

A security camera has located Wilbur Spots!

Late last night, a security camera about a half mile from Juliet's house picked up Wilbur Spots camping out in an abandoned human microwave with some blankets. Search teams have already been dispatched, and Juliet herself is going to where Wilbur Spots has been spotted. She is so relieved - Wilbur Spots is safe, for now. Now Juliet can relax without thinking about whether one of her kittens is still alive or not. In fact, all cats can take a deep breath now, knowing that a missing kittens has been found alive. Falcon risk is especially high these days, not to mention the one Mavis and a team have captured. A small, helpless kitten like Wilbur Spots would be no match for the sharp beak and talons of a falcon. It is very fortunate that Wilbur Spots is unhurt, at least to the security camera.

Image above - Wilbur Spots camping out in some blankets in an abandoned human microwave.

Early this morning, Wilbur Spots was found and taken home by Juliet. He seemed so relieved to be back home, and he was even happier to see the look on Graypelt's face when Wilbur Spots showed him a scrap of metal from outside, completing Graypelt's dare. Wilbur Spots doesn't usually gloat, but this one time, he did. However, Graypelt is in big trouble with Juliet for daring Wilbur Spots to go outside in the first place. His first punishment is that he has to be the one to empty the litter boxes for 2 weeks. His second punishment is that he cannot go on any outings outside with Juliet. His last punishment, or at least to Graypelt, is that he has to apologize to Wilbur Spots for daring him to go outside and prove it when he gets back.

Harvey and many other cats are also relieved, because a missing kitten is bad news to all cats. "Wilbur is one strong kitten to have survived out there for 5 days, nearly a week," says Harvey, "scavenging for berries was a good idea, and I was and am especially surprised when I heard Wilbur Spots caught a mouse outside and ate it!" Then he said to Juliet, "You've got one mighty hunter on you hands!"

Image above - Wilbur Spots back home, gloating near Graypelt about completing his dare.

"We all love Wilbur Spots, and it is a relief and a joy to have him back in class!"

- STRIPY JR., ONE OF STRIPY'S KITTENS

Wilbur Spots did a show and tell about the scrap of metal he got from outside, and how he got it. He had been absent from Wednesday to Sunday, and all of his classmates were relieved to see him back on Monday, after a fretful weekend. Wilbur Spots is always deeply cared for by his classmates, teachers, parents, friends, and relatives. All cats are very happy and relieved that he is back, and safe in his home. Falcon sightings have tripled in the last week since Lemon went to work with them, arousing many cats' suspicions that Lemon is somehow controlling them.

Subscribe again to hear more about Lemon and the odd falcon behavior!