Judy is sick with COVID-19!

Two nights ago, after going into a human home to get good food, Judy tested positive for COVID-19. This virus is a lot rarer for cats, but Judy risked herself when she went into a human's home for food. The virus is also fast acting, and Judy fell ill by the early morning. Now, as seen in the image above, Judy is resting, fitfully. This is bad news - cat doctors have only treated 26 cat patients with the virus, and the results were not good. 8 cats have recovered, 6 cats are still sick, and 12 cats have died. Things are not looking good for Judy, with a 60% death rate with the cats who are not still sick, in death or life. All of Judy's sisters want to be near her, but they don't want to risk catching it too. 3 doctors are at Judy's house right now, with a ventilator and other equipment to help treat the virus. However, if Judy is to get better, one of the doctors had a job for Mavis. Get a bottle of the COVID-19 vaccine from humans. However, this was easier said than done.

Mavis crept into a loading place for humans, and quickly located the COVID-19 vaccines. She tore a package open, and dumped the contents of it into her bag. She heard bottles clatter, but none broke. Then, Mavis hightailed it out of there, as not to be seen by humans. The number on the box said that there were a hundred bottles of the vaccine in there, but a cat would only need a half bottle. So, Mavis had just stolen 200 doses of the vaccine for cats (didn't the humans need the vaccines?).

Mavis gave the doctors the vaccines, and they thanked her gratefully and got out an injector (for cats, the vaccine is a cure to the virus). The doctors carefully sucked up half a bottle, and then put the rest in a fridge to keep them cool and their bacteria strong. Then, the doctors injected Judy in the largest limb of her body. The chubby foreleg.

The doctors left in the early afternoon, when Judy was showing appetite. However, Judy cried out in pain as she tried to put weight on her chubby foreleg. It was clearly still sore from the injection. Mavis got out a crutch from when Judy had broken a chubby foreleg from trying to do the Chubby Stretch. And then Mavis pulled out a second crutch from when Judy broke a chubby foreleg from trying to improvise on the Chubby Shuffle. And then Mavis let a third crutch clatter to the floor from when Judy had broken a chubby foreleg when she tried to test whether a chubby foreleg was bouncy or not and jumped from a ten foot windowsill.

Mavis handed Judy two of the crutches but muttered to herself about how Judy's chubby foreleg bones must be weak from being broken 3 times.
