
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Someone has robbed the bank!

Late last night, someone broke into the bank and stole approximately 1 million dollars in hundred dollar bills and gold bars. This is a pretty big robbery, considering that the bank only has about 20 million dollars in the vaults. However, most cats are wondering about who did this and why.

“There haven’t been many cats upset with the workings of the bank lately,” says a clerk who works at that bank, “no one felt like they had been cheated out of money. So, I don’t think that it was one of our customers. I think that it might be a random cat that saw the bank and thought, money.”

The main cats hanging around the crime scene are North, a multi species behaviorist, and Ice, Rice, and Rice jr., investigators. This is a big job for all of them. North sure is happy he got his promotion. This is one of the perks - you get to have a behavioral voice on crimes that happen.

Image above - a picture taken this morning of the bank’s front doors, each with a broken window.

Naya, for once, is worried. She has about 100 thousand saved in the bank, and this bank has a rule that if your money is stolen, you have to go on the regular wait list to get it back. This could take months, and Naya doesn't want to risk running out of money. This morning, she is going to check in with some bank clerks about where the money was stolen from. Mavis, on the other hand, puts her money in many different banks. That way, she has many different funds of cash when she needs it, and if it is stolen from one place, she could easily wait to get it back.

Just 1 hour ago, Ice found a vital clue. The thief left some fingerprints on the glass doors of the bank when they climbed through. Obviously they put on the gloves after that, because there were no finger or paw prints in the bank itself. This is very important, because it will give the police something to identify. After identifying the fingerprints, they can check them with other cats around the scene to see if they stole the money.

Image above - Judy, glaring at Rudy with a "I'd turn you over to the police in an instant the second I know you've committed a serious enough crime" look.

"If I knew Rudy robbed the bank, I'd turn her in right now to the police."

- JUDY, BUT REALLY?

Harvey is hoping that no one he knew was involved in the robbery. A robbery of this size could land you with a 5 year sentence in jail, and he doesn't want that for any of his family or friends. However, he's already glad that he knows Naya didn't rob the bank based on her worried attitude. And, Harvey read her mind just in case. He'd have to apologize for that later. However, the longer this robbery sits, the longer the sentence could be for the culprit because of the wait time and the evading authorities. Pleading guilty might just be the best thing right now.

Subscribe again for more on Harvey's mind reading and this new robbery!