bomb was dropped right on the sand near some kittens, but a mother cat bravely jumped on top of it before it exploded (don't read this next sentence if you are feeling sick already). The mother cat was buried, if in pieces. No kittens were harmed by the bomb. 7, Harvey's therapy office was bombed at night. There were no casualties, as no cat was in the office at the time. However, the office was badly damaged and Harvey is going to need a while to make repairs. 8, the most malicious attack yet was on the elementary school. 5 bombs were dropped in different parts of the school, and all exploded at bad times. There were 7 casualties, of 2 teachers, 2 parent cats, a kindergartner, and two 4th graders. 8 other cats were injured, amounting th(is/ese) terrorist(s) hurt count to 9 injuries, and the cause to 12 deaths. Cats are appalled, and the doomsday prepper count in the city has jumped by 679 percent.

Here are a couple examples of what some cats are doing to avoid bombings. Take Naya, for example. She has brought her kittens, all of their belongings, her belongings, and other things around the house into her basement. She let her kittens bring their video game consoles, and has installed several plugs around her basement. Naya is thinking about living in the basement forever, as she has a fridge, a comfortable bed, and seeds in case she needs to plant crops. And if she starts to go insane, she'll always have Glommer.

“What’s a Glommer?”

Juliet, however, has had to take a very different approach. She has a small basement, and has too much stuff she wants to move into it. So, Juliet has payed her kittens in video games to dig more space in her basement. They are doing it quite well, even if Juliet’s requests are breaking over 15 assorted kitten labor laws. Now, Juliet’s basement is spacious, and her kittens have enough okayed video game time to last them the rest of their life.
