
CATS ILLUSTRATED

72.3% of cats in the city think it's doomsday!

Ever since the massive bombing attack yesterday, many more cats in the city are believing that it is doomsday. Grocery stores are running low on supplies, as cats are buying out most of the shelf stable food just in case. As in the headline, 72.3% of cats and climbing believe that it is doomsday. However, police cats are trying to get these bombings under control.

Image above - Juliet, just one of many cats who think it is doomsday.

"I've never seen a bombing attack as serious as this," the police chief has noted, "a dozen planes dropping bombs all over a city - that's not something most cats have ever seen in their life." This is very true, of course, and some cats are actually wondering if it was a dream. It wasn't. Unfortunately though, these bombings have created a situation that is not solvable by the police. As read about in the last issue, the police chief has asked Coffee to deploy some military forces to help with the fight against the bombers. Right now, 3 tanks and 5 warplanes are heading to the city right now, full of cat soldiers. However, if the bombers try and fight back, this could become a small war.

Harvey, one of the only cats who is not convinced that it is doomsday, is still worried about all the fighting that will take place in the city. There will be damage, and lots of it. Harvey is hoping that the fighting will not reach to places near where he lives, as Harvey has not moved all his stuff into his basement and has just finished repairing and reorganizing his therapy office. Taking damage now would really hurt Harvey, as he's not sure his therapy office can take much more.

Unfortunately, we have had trouble interviewing cats who are spending their time in their basement. Most of the cats believe that we are bomber cats dressed up and that we are about to bomb their house and kill them. Well news flash to those cats, we aren't going to do that. However, we did find a couple of cats, including Lunch, who will comment. "Up until now, I wasn't concerned that it was doomsday. However, when a dozen bomber planes drop bombs on your home city, it's going to take a toll on you," Lunch has commented, as a bomb was dropped very near her Luncheon.

"What was the natural disaster of 2016?"

- RUDY, JUDY, MAVIS, LUNCH, AND MANY OTHER CATS YOU KNOW THAT ARE 4 OR YOUNGER

"I've been prepping for 'doomsday' since the natural disaster of 2016," says Turk, a 6 year old cat, "but I've seen bombings before, and they aren't that bad. Today I went for a nice walk in the neighborhood, something I have not done for years. These bombings have done me good as well as done everyone else bad!" Turk is a cat with a very unusual situation. You'd think that bombings would make him believe that doomsday was coming even more.

Subscribe again for the arrival of the military!

Image above - Rudy, another one of the very few cats who do not believe that it is doomsday.