CATS ILLUSTRATED

This fight is coming - to an explosive end!

While some soldier cats ran from the fast approaching bomber planes, others stayed in the tanks and shot and the planes some more. One tank was lucky enough to shoot a bomber plane on the left side of its wing, and it spiraled to the right, away from the soldiers. It crashed, and then exploded. The explosion wasn't large, but it was enough to discourage more soldier cats from staying in the tanks and armored police vehicles. But by now, the planes were nearly upon the tanks and armored police vehicles, and a few straggler soldiers. The planes were diving fast, and they would crash in mere seconds.

However, when the bomber planes seemed about to crash, they banked up after dropping a bomb. The bombs exploded, and it just looked like the planes had crashed. The tank was not very damaged, but some of the machinery was smashed. However, most of the soldier cats were cheering. The bombers had most likely been killed in the “crash”, and all of the planes had been shot down. It was another job well done.

However, while the soldier cats and the police cats whooped in satisfaction, Harvey noticed something odd. His house was quite close to where the bomber planes had “crashed”, and he was the only cat who had seen the bomber planes drop bombs and bank up. Harvey had seen the fighting before the dive, and knew that the bomber planes’ engines were damaged. They probably wouldn’t get far, but they’d be far enough away. If the police and soldier cats saw a damaged bomber plane on the ground, they’d probably assume that they’d shot it down. It was an amazing getaway, Harvey thought, but not perfect.

Harvey ran outside to tell the police and soldiers what he had seen, but it was too late. The sound of gunfire echoed from high in the sky, and Harvey watched in dismay, as 3 bomber planes shot down one of the circling warplanes. Then the planes unleashed gunfire on the tanks, smashing their guns and damaging the treads. Soldiers pulled out their rifles and started shooting, but many were struck by the gunfire from above. One lucky shot landed on the wing of one of the bomber planes, and because of its already failing engine, it spiraled down and crashed.

“How did you get a reporter into the area of the fight without being noticed?”

- JULIET, WHO IS IMPRESSED WITH OUR SNEAKINESS

The armored police vehicles were full of soldiers, pointing their rifles up at the planes while trying to keep their head under the roof of the police vehicle. However, the bomber planes were fast and relentless, and it was hard to get shots off, let alone hit one of the 2 remaining planes.
