The muggings have been revealed as a scam!

Yesterday, an anonymous cat participating in the video game contest had a revelation - they knew why the muggings had happened. They played out their game with their team, got a third place finish in one of the groups, and then that cat went to the police right away. The police came to the video game tournament while it was dispersing and told the organizers what had happened. The organizers called all of the cats back, and then the police picked out the team of eight cats who fit the description of the eight muggers. The police took them down to the station for questioning, and the cats broke. The cats that were mugged all had things in common - they all had kittens that liked video games or liked video games themselves, or even both. Mavis had chosen not to participate, but she and her kittens liked video games. The cats were trying to make the cats who might enter afraid - afraid that they might be mugged again. And it worked - most of the mugged cats and their teams didn't make it to the next round. However, there was an open spot now - the team of muggers had been automatically disqualified.

A lot of teams were gunning for that spot, but in the end a raffle decided it. It turns out one of the teams with one of the mugged cats on it got picked, which is pretty fair in the end. The team of muggers were grumbling, as they would have to pay a fine for mugging and possibly spend a night or two in jail. Many cats are satisfied with this, except one mugged cat - Judy. She wasn't mugged by one of those cats, but by Rudy, her sister. That burns. However, Rudy has spent most of the money in Judy's wallet and shows no sign that she will stop spending. Judy is mad, because there was nearly 50 dollars in that wallet at the time. Rudy has spent the money on snacks and treats and then mailed the bags or wrappers to Judy, making her even more furious.

Many cats are relieved that the mugging scan has been exposed and is over, even though there are worse issues that have still not been resolved, such as a murder.

However, little triumphs are important too. We have also heard of some good news, which we have not focused on for a while. Remember the issue when we ended on the fact that a big new gym had been built? Well, it wasn't popular just then, but right now, a surge of cats are using the treadmills, rock walls, and even the pool. Rudy went today and said that it was very fun, even though she only relaxed in the cinema and watched old style movies. That doesn't really count, because the cinema is technically another building next to the gym.
