
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Cats are rioting against the alcohol ban!

Ever since an alcohol ban was put in place to discourage kitten misbehaviors of sneaking alcohol, stores have not been able to sell any kind of beer, wine, whiskey, or anything that has alcohol in it. However, some cats who are used to having a beer or 2 a day have become a bit crazy because of the withdrawal. Yesterday, a crowd of cats was seen and filmed outside a liquor shop shouting, “we want beer! We want beer!” This has made authorities a bit nervous, and yesterday the police let some cats have a bit of alcohol. However, a group of kittens somehow got ahold of a couple of bottles of vodka, and had a giant party at the park where kittens took turns sipping from the bottle and letting the alcohol burn on the way down. There was music, snacks, and of course, alcohol. The police had to step in to shut

Image above - Juliet, who has not had alcohol in the past 2 weeks and is going crazy because of it.

it down, and the ban was put back in place and would be enforced strictly.

Unfortunately, there was another riot later in the night, around 11 P.M. A gang broke into a winery and stole 15 bottles of wine, and have been selling them to cats all over the city at something like 5 or 6 times their normal price. However, there was no shortage of buyers, and the police sensed another heist could go down, and locked down the area. However, the family that owned the winery had kittens, 5 of them, and in the very early morning 6 more bottles of wine went missing. Kittens snuck out of their houses, and went back to the park to continue their party. There was no music or snacks this time, just kittens taking turns sipping wine and giggling over tales of triumphs and getting drunk.

That party was shut down 2 hours later, when Lunch had a craving for chocolate at 3 A.M. She went to check on her kittens, and then, them being gone, called the police. Some cats had reported strange sounds from the park a little earlier, and it didn't take much for the police to put two and two together and shut down that party. There were no more parties that night, no more thefts, or anything. However, things backfired this morning when kittens fell asleep at the breakfast table, and kittens at school didn't even try to stay awake. Most kittens had gotten a few hours of sleep at most, and were exhausted.

Image above - Rudy, who doesn't mind if her kittens sneak out to drink alcohol if she can fight with Judy while they're busy.

"I would riot if sugar was banned!"

- HARVEY, WHO PROBABLY WOULD RIOT

The police are realizing that this ban has been causing problems, but lifting the ban could potentially cause more. The ban is still in place, but the police have advised liquor shops and wineries to keep a close eye out for theft. Stealing alcohol while there is a ban is technically against the law, but some cats (like kittens) will go that far. Many parent cats have no idea what to do with kittens who like alcohol more than them, and are very worried.

Subscribe again for more alcohol riots!