

---

CATS ILLUSTRATED

---

A drunk police officer has locked up a kitten!

Today, the big news is that a drunk police officer has locked up a kitten for accidentally kicking a ball that broke someone's window. The kitten was placed in a holding cell with actual thieves and criminals, and was horribly scared. The kitten's parents have sued the department, and gotten their kitten back. However, the kitten was not that hurt - in fact, they were happy as they had asked the actual thieves on tips for how to rob someone or break in. The kitten's parents sued the department a bit more after that.

Image above - Juliet, who is furious that a police officer (even a drunk one) would lock up a kitten.

---

Now, there are two things wrong with this situation. The obvious one, that no police officer should never ever even think about locking up a kitten (now that last thing could be a bit hard at times), and two, that the officer was drunk, even though there is a citywide alcohol ban. The officer was fired, and was forced to tell their former comrades where they had gotten the alcohol. It turned out that one of the liquor shops had seen the chance to make some profit, and had started selling alcohol secretly at 3 or 4 times its regular price. The police closed the shop permanently, and confiscated all alcohol.

At school today, kittens in class could not focus on anything except the story of the kitten who had gotten arrested. The kitten charged a dollar per kitten who heard the story, and became rich fast from all of the curious kittens and repeat visitors who just had to hear it again. At lunch, the kitten charged other kittens 5 dollars to say what the thieves told them. That went a bit too far though, and one very fast learning kitten picked a teacher's pocket. They actually got away with it, and got bolder. However, the principal caught them trying to break the lock of the safe holding school funds. This was one of those times when police thought about locking up a kitten.

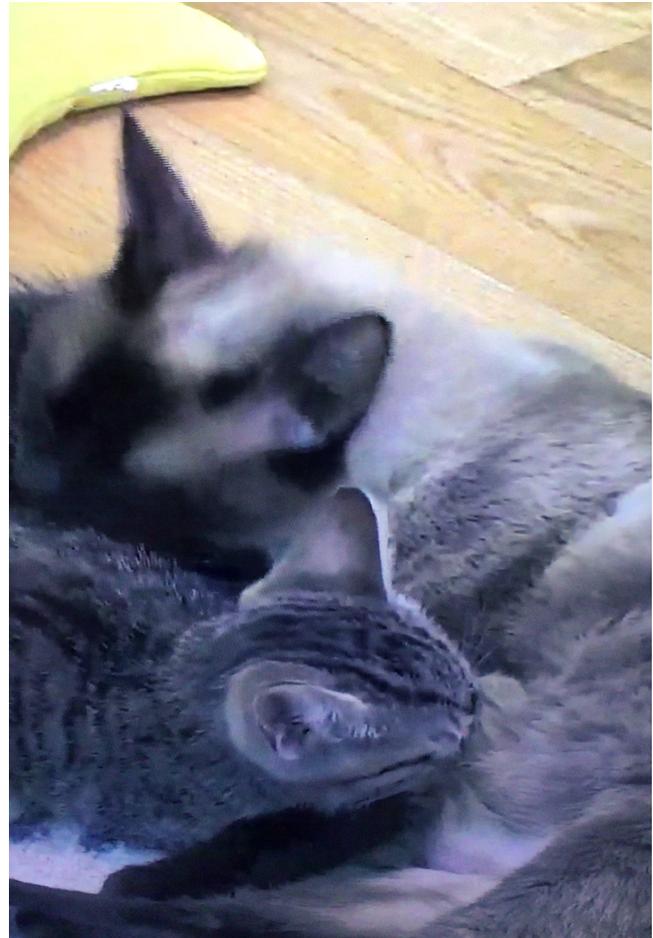

Image above - Lunch, who doesn't see anything wrong with letting her kittens learn a few tricks of the trade.

Instead, the kitten was suspended for three days, but by the evening of yesterday, theft rates had more than tripled. Kittens got the money to buy what they wanted from nowhere, and some actually bought a motorcycle after dressing up as an older cat. Three kittens piled on, but the motorcycle shop attendant didn't see until it was too late. The kittens zoomed off.

“I know I said my kittens could learn some tricks, I didn't want to be the one targeted!”

- LUNCH, WHO LOST A WALLET

The three kittens on the motorcycle, Obsidian, Wilbur Spots, and one of their friends were apprehended twenty minutes later by police cruisers. They were sent home, and the motorcycle was returned to the shop. However, the three kittens on the motorcycle would never forget that feeling of the wind in their face while they were zooming along.

Subscribe again for more bad behavior!