There was a soda explosion at the grocery store!

When a new shipment of soda came in for the grocery store, an employee accidentally put some of the boxes on top of one of the grocery store heaters. This soda gets very fizzy when heated, and when the heat was too much, the cans exploded. Well, the tops of the cans did at least. No cat was hurt, but a couple cats were showered in warm soda. The exploded soda lids did not hit any cats, but the grocery store is still a mess from the explosion. Some advanced cleaners were called in so that the sugar in the soda does not attract ants. Many cats are surprised that a thing like this happened, as exploding soda is not your usual newsletter headline.

Cats have agreed that this is the oddest occurrence in a while, because soda exploding is a science project staple, not something that happened because of a mistake. However, a good percentage of cats are more sad for the soda gone to waste than the dirty and sticky grocery store. Harvey knows that he would have bought at least a couple six packs of that soda, and is disappointed that he will not be able to replenish his stash of sweet drinks.

Kittens are also disappointed about all of the lost soda, because kittens love a fizzy drink now and then and the arcade usually serves soft drinks. However, losing this much soda will probably affect the stores of restaurants, including Lunch's Luncheon. In fact, Lunch already ran out of Catca Cola. Now, cats are willing to go anywhere for a cold, fizzy soda. Some cats including Naya already have big stashes of soda, and Naya has started selling hers. She brought out a big jug of Catca Cola and sold it for a dollar per small paper cup. Cats have swarmed her stall, and Naya is really making a profit right now.

There is now a shortage of soda in Pawsville, at least until next week when the food replenishing truck comes with a new shipment of soda and other produce. However, cats have been trying to recreate the taste of soda. All of the fizzy water was bought from the grocery store, and right now cats are experimenting in basement labs with different quantities of sugar, fizzy water, and Bottle Cap candies flavored like soda.

“That’s smart - getting paid while cats clean you.”

Still, many cats are surprised about how the soda went to waste - you definitely do not hear about soda exploding every day. However, the cats who have it the worst are the cats who were drenched with warm soda. But at least they are making a few bucks off cats who want to lick them.
