
CATS ILLUSTRATED

The school science fair is coming up!

Every year, there is a large science fair right after Thanksgiving break. Kittens have been busy building their projects. Here are the ideas of a few kittens.

“I’m making a huge volcano,” says Gingerbread, “it will erupt and and the “lava” will run down the clay side of my volcano, and hopefully it will erode the clay a little bit. But the key to this experiment is doing it a bunch of times in a row to get erosion.” Gingerbread has been working very hard on their project, and it seems like they might even win a prize. However, not all projects are as creative as Gingerbread’s. Maroon, one of Stripy’s kittens, came up with the idea to do a project on the effect of video games on the brain. Maroon didn't know what kind of research would be required, so he just played video games and decided whether his brain had reacted or not. He came up with the conclusion that there was no effect on the brain, but that might be a bit off.

Image above - Juliet, who can’t wait to find out what her kittens came up with for their science projects.

A few kittens decided on "topics" that were downright dangerous. Stygian, one of Lunch's kittens, did his science project on how many pounds of fries he could eat before throwing up. No cat can even guess why this topic would seem appealing, as Stygian choked down a pound of fries before throwing up into a bucket. Lunch's Luncheon supplied the fries, and the bucket. However, this wasn't the only science project that was off the rails. Blackpelt Jr., one of Juliet's kittens, decided that it would be fun to see if it was possible to light himself on fire with just his glasses. And the bad part is that he succeeded. Luckily, there was a pond nearby, and though it did not look clean, water is water so Blackpelt Jr. jumped in.

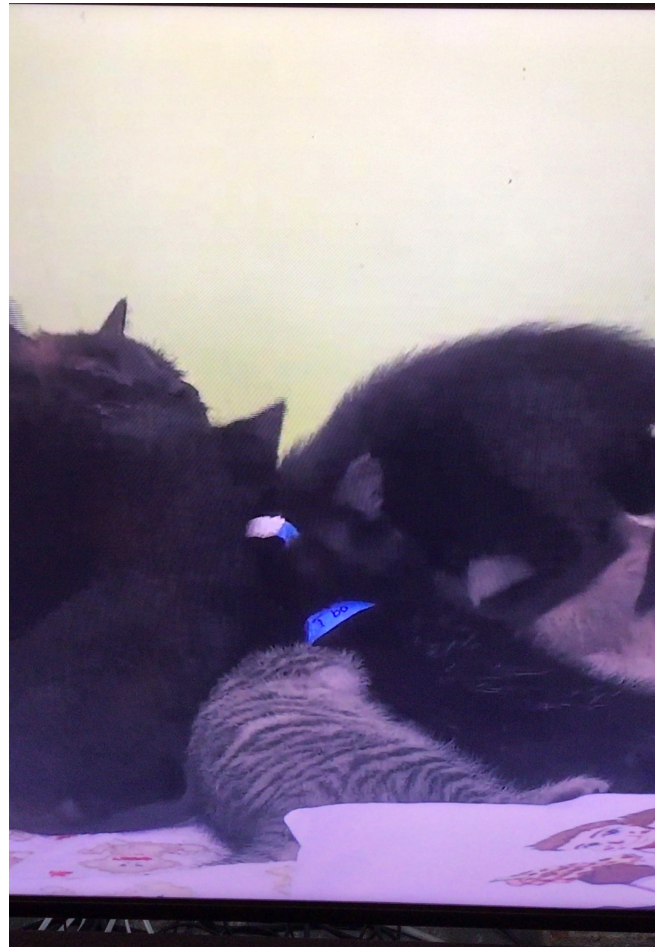

Image above - Lunch, who thinks kittens lighting themselves on fire is a bit too much.

However, this next project was the only one that got a kitten injured. Somnolent, another one of Lunch's kittens, thought it would be fun to see if he could jump on a trampoline while kittens threw metal tipped throwing stars at him, and whether it would be possible to avoid one by twisting to the left or right in the air. What Somnolent really wanted to do was make a catTube video of it. In that he succeeded, but one of the throwing stars caught his pelt after the video finished filming. Somnolent twisted to the right, and fell out of the trampoline and onto the ground with a crack. He broke three ribs and a front leg.

"My catTube video has 1.3 million hits!"

- SOMNOLENT, WHO DOESN'T SEEM TO CARE ABOUT HIS BROKEN BONES

Cats agree that these science fair projects have gone too far. Next year, the school is going to put strict restrictions on certain "science" topics.

Subscribe again for more on the science fair!