
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Today is the day of the science fair!

Today is the day of the school science fair for kittens! In the past few days, kittens have been finishing up their projects, and will now present them in the school science fair. However, some science fair projects had to be recorded because their creator was hurt in the process of testing them. Blackpelt Jr. is still coming, but he will not be lighting himself on fire again in a flammable building. He does have his video, and it looks good.

Image above - Harvey, who is attending the science fair in the hope that there will be free food.

Many parent cats are excited for the school science fair, to see what their kittens have made projects for. However, some parent cats might be a bit disappointed to see many “Effect of video games on the ____” projects.

Besides Maroon, about six other kittens did projects that basically included playing video games for hours on end in project research times.

Like Gingerbread, some kittens came up with some interesting topics. Black, one of Lunch's kittens, made a helium filled mask made to disguise your voice. It works, but your voice sounds very strange when you use it. Rice Jr., one of Juliet's kittens, made a bench press working solely on air pressure. It looked a little strange and very complicated, but it worked just like any other bench press. However, there were still some not so good projects, like the one Wilbur Spots made, about whether it was possible to get drunk without drinking alcohol. Wilbur Spots drank jugs of juice, soda, milk, and other beverages but only got an upset stomach.

At the science fair, there are many tables, each with the project of a kitten. Adult cats can walk around the tables and observe and try out the projects of kittens. Kittens can also "close" their stations while they go and try out fellow kittens' projects. At the end, the school will announce who had the first, second, and third place projects. The prizes are just ribbons, but it does also mean recognition at your school.

Image above - Judy, who's going to sabotage the projects of Rudy's kittens.

“Cats at the science fair are really quite careless with their wallets.”

- NAYA

Harvey has also been wandering around the science fair, looking for projects along the lines of a solar powered grill or a hydraulic blender to get something to eat. There was a kitten selling snacks, but Harvey was only allowed a few measly crackers. However, there is a solar powered grill project in the science fair. But cats have been advising the cat who made the project to move around a lot as not to attract Harvey, because if Harvey saw that grill, he'd be over there in a flash placing an order for five hot dogs. And then he'd come back a little bit later with little kitten eyes begging for just one more hot dog. And so on. It really is a vicious cycle.

Subscribe again for more on the science fair!