

---

CATS ILLUSTRATED

---

Kittens have started drinking fruit juice!

Recently, kittens have been drinking fruit juice in place of soda. Many cats are very happy that kittens aren't drinking soda anymore, but fruit juice isn't that simple. Juliet encouraged drinking fruit juice until she actually read the label, which stated that the jug of fruit juice contained seventy grams of sugar and had no actual fruit juice in it.

Image above - Rudy, who isn't sure that fruit juice is actually that healthy.

---

However, there are varying types of fruit juice. Juliet's kittens had the most unhealthy kind, but Lunch's kittens' jug of juice only had fifty grams of sugar in it and was fifty percent real fruit juice. No kitten could tell the difference anyway, but the amounts of sugar and real fruit juice mattered to parent cats. Juliet's kittens had their jug confiscated, but Lunch's kittens were told that they could drink their fruit juice for a dessert if they wanted. However, Lunch's kittens weren't happy with this, and they went over to the houses of other kittens who had gotten their juice confiscated to come up with a rebellion plan.

Today when cats woke up, all of the liquids in their fridge were gone. Even the ice cream cartons were gone from the freezer. A little earlier, kittens had taken all of the liquids and put them in Lunch's Luncheon's giant walk-in fridge. The fridge was guarded by a phalanx of kittens, who knew that they would be paid later in the form of fruit juice. However, the real action was in the town square, where a few kittens with bodyguards were calling adult cats to come and negotiate if they wanted to get their drinks back. Many cats came out from their houses, including Naya, who hadn't had her morning beer and wasn't happy about it.

Image above - Juliet, who thinks that beer is a nighttime drink, not a morning drink.

Kittens have said that if cats don't fork over ten bottles of high sugar fruit juice, they won't get their liquids back, and that included ice cream. However, some cats had been talking to the police, and while the few kittens with their bodyguards negotiated in the town square, five police officers had snuck off to Lunch's Luncheon to storm the building.

“Yeah, I have a morning beer, an afternoon beer, and then three evening beers!”

- NAYA

But kittens aren't that stupid. They had left twenty five kittens at Lunch's Luncheon, each with varying degrees of weapons. Five kittens on the roof held bows, ten stood on the ground with shields and armor, and the other ten stood inside Lunch's Luncheon. Those were the elite kittens who had been tasked with guarding the treasure — and they were ready for a fight. And at this point, you gotta feel bad for those police officers who have no idea what they are walking into.

Subscribe again for more on this juice scandal!