
CATS ILLUSTRATED

There was a food fight at the local middle school!

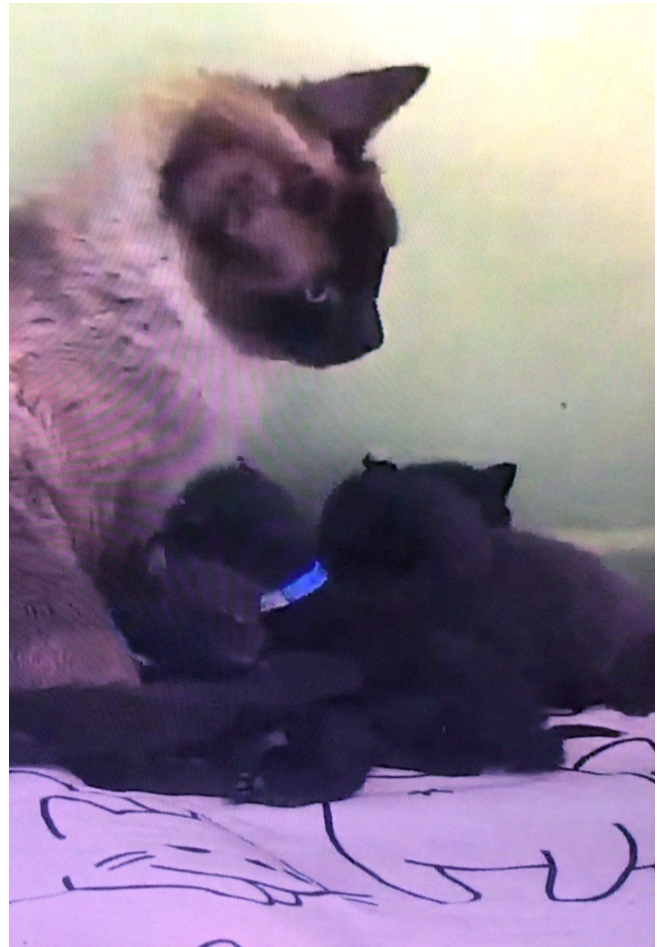

Yesterday, there was an epic food fight in the middle school cafeteria. It started out when one kitten proposed a lunch trade, a cookie for some soda. The other kitten agreed, but when they handed over the soda, the first kitten gobbled up their cookie and ran off with the soda. The other kitten was mad, and they instructed their friends to throw food at the first kitten. And eventually, it was just chaos.

The main problem was that some kitten managed to chuck an open can of apple juice at the projector off to the side of the cafeteria. The projector sparked, and broke. As the school is desperate to sue a kitten's parents, they have told other kittens that if they turn over the kitten who threw the juice box, there was a twenty dollar reward to claim. If kittens knew who had actually thrown that juice box, that one poor kitten would have been swarmed.

Image above - Rudy, who's unhappy with her kittens throwing food at cats other than Judy's kittens.

However, a broken projector isn't the only problem. Some cat had chucked a handful of peanuts, and they ended up in a vat of food that was served today. One of the kittens who ate the school lunch was allergic to peanuts, and their face swelled up. There was also a twenty dollar reward set out for the peanut-throwing kitten, because peanuts were strictly banned and the parents of that kitten would be sued. Unfortunately, there were more problems. Some spicy chips were thrown into some chicken soup, and some kittens nearly choked on the chip bits, even though all the flavor had washed away. The salad tasted funny, until kittens realized the dressing had been mixed with whipped cream.

This whole scandal has also left food remains on the walls, which the school janitor is being paid extra to clean up. However, there are some harder to clean things, such as the mashed potatoes stuck twenty five feet up on the wall, and the cabbage that got stuck in the basketball net. The latter might be easier to get.

Image above - Lunch, who needs to know whether her kittens were part of this food fight.

“I told mama that I had been in the food fight — and she gave me a high five!

- ONE OF NAYA'S KITTENS

Parent cats have been grilling their kittens on the topic of the food fight — and they are threatening punishment if the culprits do not come clean. In the end, no reward needed to be given out because the peanut-throwing kitten and the juice-box throwing kittens turned each other in, as to collect the twenty dollar rewards. But a deal's a deal, and the principal handed each kitten twenty dollars before suspending them both for three days and then putting them in detention for a month after that.

Subscribe again for more on this food fight!