

CATS ILLUSTRATED

Kittens are opening up their own restaurants!

As kittens feel that they need more money and that they have too much healthy food in their fridges and freezers, many kittens have decided to open their own mini-restaurants. However, all of the kittens interested in this had to have a meeting to assign different food types to each group of kittens. Lunch's kittens got "greasy food" because what Lunch's Luncheon serves can be greasy, while Juliet's kittens got "Italian food" because Juliet had some old recipes tucked away.

Many adult cats aren't sure what to think about these emerging new restaurants. The food sounded good, but then again, kittens were cooking it.

Image above - Rudy, talking with her kittens about their new restaurant.

However, some kittens had things that they weren't letting other kittens in on. Lunch's kittens would be stealing burgers off the grill from Lunch's Luncheon, Juliet's kittens would go to an Italian restaurant for takeout, and Rudy's kittens, assigned the food type "ramen" would use the instant ramen supply in their cupboard. Luckily, only Blackspots liked that ramen, so Rudy's kittens wouldn't have their cover blown unless Blackspots came to their stand.

Though they thought their plan was foolproof, Juliet's kittens realized that they couldn't even pay for the Italian food by itself. However, Wilbur Spots had an idea. He had always been interested in the frozen foods aisle in the grocery store, so he led the rest of Juliet's kittens there. Sure enough, there were lots of boxes of frozen ravioli, spaghetti and meatballs, and other pastas and salads. It was really cheap, too. Juliet's kittens pooled their remaining money, and they bought three boxes of ravioli, a large spaghetti and meatball box, and a small salad. It cost about twenty-two dollars, all of what Juliet's kittens had at the moment.

Today, restaurants started opening. Juliet's kittens cleared their parents out of the house, and two kittens went in to start preparing the food.

One kitten monitored the cash register, one took orders, and the others were out trying to advertise. Many other kittens opened their stores, and soon, an adult cat couldn't walk by without getting mobbed by kittens trying to promote their restaurant.

"My kittens are in the business of being a 'thief for hire!'"

- NAYA, WHO'S PROUD OF HER KITTENS

Pawsville is still pretty chilly, so many adult cats bought food as it was served piping hot. Lunch's kittens stole some fries from their mama's Luncheon, and Rudy's kittens cooked some eggs to go with the ramen that they were selling. But all kittens and all restaurants were making money, if only slowly.

Subscribe again for more on these mini-restaurants!

Image above - Lunch, who knows where her kittens are getting all of their food, but she isn't saying anything.