
CATS ILLUSTRATED

A new social media platform is being unveiled!

After a long wait, a technology company has unveiled its new social media platform, CatChat. CatChat was designed so cats can make accounts, and make chat rooms for themselves and their friends, but there is no way to attach photos, videos, voicemails, and other things to a post.

This is a new kind of social media platform, and the technology company is waiting to see how it will affect cats. Currently, lots of cats have been making accounts, including kittens who will be setting up chat rooms for themselves and their friends. However, there is a way to “love” posts, and follow other cats, so it CatChat isn’t completely different than other social media platforms. But most parent cats think that it is okay for their kittens to have an account on CatChat, because there is no way to share photos or videos.

Image above - Judy, who can’t wait to get on this new platform and start attacking Rudy.

Rudy and Judy will surely be using this new social media platform against each other, because that's just how they are. However, even Harvey is making an account on CatChat, because he doesn't see the harm in other cats hearing his opinions on Jeeps and sugar. Naya is also making an account on CatChat, as she wants to share her stealing tips with the world. Stripy is making an account on CatChat to share recipes for casseroles, and Mavis has decided that cats should know about the wonders of cabbages.

CatChat only has one shady function. On the main page, there is small print reading "all activity in CatChat is monitored." This has freaked out some kittens, and even adult cats are a bit shaken up. That means that no private ChatRoom is really private—it means that when you spill your secrets to your friends, you're spilling those secrets to the developers of CatChat. A few kittens have even deleted accounts, and they've just agreed to use a regular messaging app instead of CatChat.

Image above - Juliet, who doesn't really want all of her chats monitored.

"I don't care if I'm monitored — I need to show Rudy that I'm the dominant one!"

- JUDY, WHO DOESN'T CARE ABOUT BEING MONITORED

something mean. This seems more fair, and cats have tentatively embraced the idea of CatChat for now.

On other social media platforms, screenshots of the small print on the CatChat main page has gone viral. CatChat has wanted to remove it, but it would count as breaking the law. If you monitor a social media platform, you have to say that you do. However, CatChat is not happy about this, and they are suing the cats that put that law into action. However, CatChat has come up with a new idea. They have announced that they will only monitor certain accounts, and only if the account says

Subscribe again for more on CatChat!