
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Lunch is buying an electric car!

Because she does not want to add any more gas fumes to the world, Lunch is buying an all-electric car. The car has two good front seats for her and Jake, and then a big back row said to fit up to ten kittens. However, getting an electric car has some complications. For firsts, Lunch needs somewhere to charge her car. She has bought a huge outlet for her house, and she is getting another one for her Luncheon. But electricity costs money, too. It isn't anywhere near the cost of gas, but it is still a lot.

Image above - Juliet, who thinks that an electric car is a good idea.

The fact that Lunch is buying an electric car has made cats think about whether they would like a car like that, too. Rudy has a hybrid car, but you never have to recharge it and it isn't quite the same. Still, cats are thinking about getting electric cars. However, Harvey is thoroughly disappointed with the choice of electric cars. There is no model with any similarities to a Jeep, and no electric car can go farther than three hundred miles on a charge. That is the one downside to an electric car — it needs to be recharged often.

Lunch's electric car dealership is from out of town, so she has to drive her old car there to pick up her new one. Lunch is donating her old car to a used car dealership, as it is still in pretty good condition. Lunch can then walk to the dealership where her new car is. Jake and Lunch's kittens are very excited to see how the car looks in real life, as they have seen photos of it online. Lunch's kittens are excited about the built-in tablets on the backs of the front seats, so you can watch or play something while driving. Jake is excited about the seat warming on the front seats, and Lunch plans on using her built in fan a little too much.

Image above - Rudy, who knows that her hybrid can drive twice as many miles as any electric car on one tank of gas.

When Lunch's kittens were boasting about the car's cool features, it got some unwanted attention. Naya has been holed up trying to figure out how to smuggle a car from a locked garage to her garage without making a sound. But Lunch has already anticipated this, and she paid extra to get extra safety features built in on her car, including a car alarm that alerts Lunch's catPhone, and a call 911 function if the cat driving is not a cat on Lunch's personal list.

“There are hybrid Jeeps on the market!”

- HARVEY, WHO IS SERIOUSLY CONSIDERING GETTING ONE

This fuss about electric cars is making cats think about getting one, or at least getting a new hybrid. Right now, an old car feels like an ancient car, and even a generally new car feels old and out of style. But Rudy has raised an important point. A hybrid can drive for much longer than an electric car.

Subscribe again for more on electric cars!