

CATS ILLUSTRATED

Kittens have gotten into VR video games!

Recently, kittens have really gotten into VR video games. VR stands for virtual reality, and you can use it by putting special goggles over your head. Some VR games include Olympic cycling, which you need a stationary bike for, and Power Blast, a game where you are constantly turning and shooting blasts of power at enemies who are approaching on all sides.

Image above - Rudy and her kittens, talking about VR video games.

The bad thing about the VR games is that there is only one cat who has a pair of goggles. North got the VR game goggles for Christmas, from Harvey, who kind of assumed that North would let him use them. However, North has gotten into playing Power Blast, and Harvey doesn't get much time to play the game “Eat the Donuts.” Kittens have gotten turns with the VR game goggles, but North is strongly recommending that they get pairs of their own. However, VR game goggles are expensive, and the only cat who was willing to get a pair was Lunch, who made her kittens promise they would help clean up her Luncheon sometime soon (not kitten labor).

The cat who has the best space for VR is Judy, who has a whole empty basement. While playing VR games, you move around a little bit, and it is best if you have lots of open space around you just in case. However, Judy does not think that there is any video game that is better than The Knight’s Quest, which she plays a lot. Judy does not want any of her kittens to get ideas about how VR games are the very best, and she does not let other kittens use her basement. The second largest and most open spot is in Rudy’s house, which has a large living room. When kittens play their VR games there, they set up barricades protecting anything fragile from accidentally being knocked over.

Image above - Juliet, who was very strongly against the idea of VR games until she tried one.

Online, a pair of VR goggles costs $110, which is a lot. So far, Lunch is the only parent cat who agreed to buy one, but other kittens have started to save up. However, most kittens have very little or no money left after buying candy all the time, and Juliet’s kittens came up with a total of thirteen dollars. Looks like some kittens will have to try and earn money from other things, like shoveling driveways once snow starts to fall again.

“We don’t have enough money to buy VR game goggles. But mama does.”

- NAYA’S KITTENS, TAKING AFTER THEIR MAMA

Kittens are very excited about VR video games right now, and for good reason. Many cats are betting that VR video games will completely replace regular video games within a few decades, as they are growing in popularity fast and it is cool to see things 3D in a video game.

Subscribe again for more on VR video games!