

---

CATS ILLUSTRATED

---

Candy is in short supply!

Though kittens don't want to admit it, there can be too much snow. It has snowed straight for the past thirty-six hours, and there is eighteen inches of snow on the ground and street. This blizzard has made it hard for supply deliveries to get to Pawsville, including the monthly candy delivery to the local convenience store. That means that candy is in short supply, and kittens and adult cats are not happy about it.

Image above - Lunch and her kittens, who know that candy is the thing keeping them going on school days and work days.

---

When cats first heard about the candy situation, the cost of candy skyrocketed. Three days ago, you could get a large bar of candy for a dollar fifty at the convenience store, and yesterday, the convenience store was sold out, and the lucky cats who had candy were putting big bars on the market for around twenty dollars a piece. However, kittens and adult cats need their candy, and large bars were being auctioned off at up to forty dollars.

That was the situation for the past two days. But now, there are only around a dozen candy bars left in Pawsville, and cats aren't willing to pay seventy-five dollars just for one. Some cats are thinking about eating their last candy bars, so that they don't get robbed. Naya is trying to sell each of her candy bars for fifty dollars, and somehow, she has six of the dozen candy bars left in Pawsville. Her kittens have just swiped two of those bars, and are splitting them each six ways. However, two bites of candy are not enough to satisfy Naya's kittens. Along with them, other kittens are digging deep in their rooms to see if there is any candy left somewhere, and adult cats have been raiding their kittens' rooms to see if they can find any candy.

Image above - Rudy, who doesn't need candy if she has soda.

Right now, most kittens have given up and are doing some half hearted sledding. Those are the lucky kittens. The unlucky kittens are the ones who are suffering from withdrawal, and are feeling too sick to leave their rooms. But kittens aren't the only ones who are getting desperate. Harvey has gone into his emergency stash of sugar cubes, five full boxes he thought he would never need to open. North is dying for some soda right now, as that too is out of stock at the convenience store.

“Cats are too nice to me. They put their food in plain sight, so easy to steal.”

- NAYA

Some cats are getting paranoid that they will run out of food at some point, and they are buying lots of stuff from the grocery store. The frozen and dried foods aisle is completely bare, and any shelf stable food is also gone. Right now, cats are hoping that the restock comes fast, but if it doesn't it will be every cat and every kitten fending for themselves.

Subscribe again for more on this food shortage!