
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Cats have been having lots of nightmares recently!

For no obvious reason, cats have been having lots of nightmares lately. Maybe the nightmares were influenced by the food shortage cats are dealing with, as there is tons of snow on the roads and the grocery store hasn't gotten a delivery in a week.

Image above - Harvey, who had a bad nightmare last night.

Cats have had some varying nightmares, at varying degrees of scariness. "I had a bad nightmare," says Judy, "in my nightmare, Rudy triumphed over me and declared herself queen of the world!" Judy seems shaken up, and Rudy has been remarking that Judy might have had a vision, not a nightmare. "I had a pretty bad nightmare," says Harvey, "I dreamt that every sugar cube I touched melted down to nothing. By the end of the dream, I was completely without sugar.” But the worst dream of all was Wilbur Spots’s nightmare. “I dreamed that all of my sibilings abandoned me,” says Wilbur Spots, “it was a really horrible nightmare.”

While most cats think that the food shortage is causing these nightmares, some cats have other ideas. “The positions of Jupiter and Saturn were very close together,” says Mavis, who believes in this kind of stuff, “that symbolizes a greater power of some sort, though it seems bad to me. These nightmares are the first wave of the invasion.” But there are other theories, too. “What if this food shortage is making our brains think of other bad situations,” says Stripy, who knows about nightmares, “dreams are just things our brain makes up. If something bad is happening, like a food shortage, our brain will make up things that seem bad, creating nightmares.”

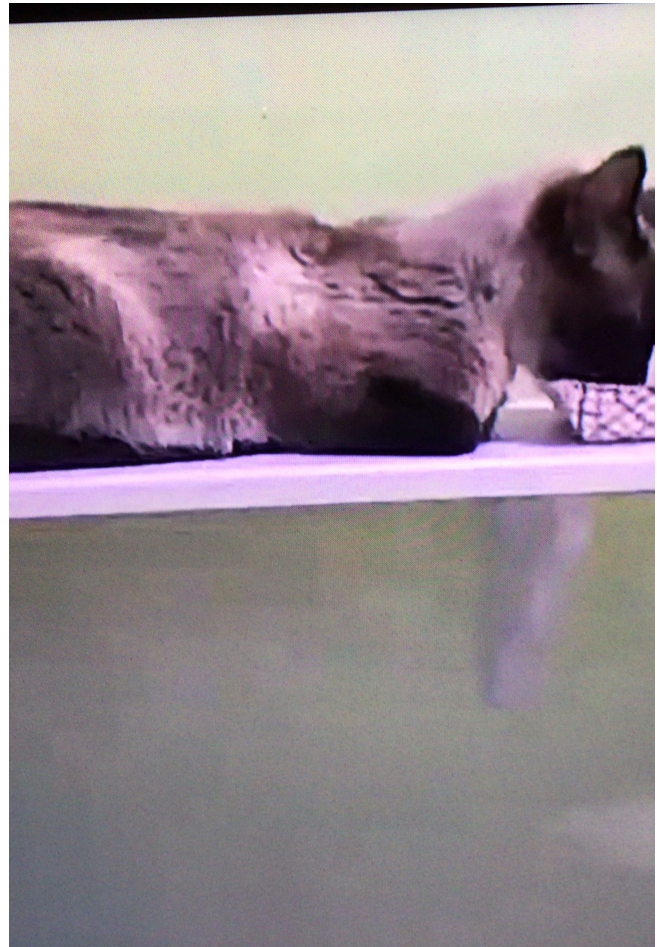

Image above - Lunch, who also gets meals from her luncheon.

Many cats agree with Stripy’s theory, as it seems very rational. Mavis has not gotten many fellow believers yet, but she is still trying to warn cats about their upcoming doom. But while that is happening, this food shortage is hitting cats hard. Lunch’s Luncheon had gotten a restock a few days before the big blizzard, so Lunch has set up a program where cats in need can get a free meal during breakfast, lunch, or dinner.

“My kittens are smart. They don’t need me to feed them meals.”

- NAYA, WHO ONLY CARES ABOUT HERSELF

Even though the plows aren’t anywhere near Pawsville, cats have been doing fine, even with this food shortage. As there is lots of snow, sledding and skiing are still fun activities to pass time, and of course, cats are also playing lots of video games. However, not all cats are okay. Harvey is down to two boxes of sugar cubes, even with careful rationing. North is asking around Pawsville to see if any cats have any extra sugar, because Harvey needs it badly.

Subscribe again for more on this food shortage!