Lunch's Luncheon has run out of food!

As the roads going into and out of Pawsville are still covered in snow and ice, Lunch's Luncheon has not been able to get any deliveries for more than a week. Lunch went out for some supplies several days ago, but those are now long gone. Lunch has had to turn away hungry cats because her luncheon's pantry is bare. Lunch does not know what to do right now, as who knows how long the roads will be unsafe to drive on.

Lunch has been thinking about making another trip into the next town over to get supplies. She wouldn't be able to fit too much in her car, maybe enough food for a few days. Lunch really needs her weekly delivery to come again, because she does not want to have to turn away hungry cats who want a meal. But the roads are still very icy, and most snowplows are still miles from Pawsville.

Many restaurants in Pawsville have been having the same problem as Lunch. The Wish for Fish had gotten a big delivery before the blizzard hit, but now they are running out of food. Taco caT still has a decently filled pantry, as they aren't quite as popular as The Wish for Fish or Lunch's Luncheon. But right now, many cats have been swarming Taco caT, trying to get one last takeout meal before Taco caT runs out of food. However, the grocery store has been running very low on things, too. The canned foods aisle was emptied out days ago, and the frozen foods disappeared pretty quickly, too. In fact, even all of the candy bars that you usually see at a grocery store check out line were gone as well.

Many cats have been going with the logic that it is every cat for themselves, and they have been buying up lots of food from the grocery store just in case there are no food deliveries for a month. However, even kittens have gotten in on the act, and in Rudy's house, all of the chips, candy, and cans of soup disappeared from the pantry. Her kittens locked themselves in their room, boarding up the windows and barricading the doors so that they could play video games in peace.

“I’m not greedy. I’m just making sure I survive this food shortage.”

- JUDY, WHO STOLE HALF THE FOOD FROM HER PANTRY FOR HERSELF

Many cats are just hoping that Pawsville gets some food deliveries soon, because the situation is getting a little out of hand. However, there will be a big rush for food when restaurants and the grocery store get food deliveries, and they may be sold out of most food items within the first day after the delivery. There might even be the need for a double delivery, with twice the supplies and food.
