
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Rudy has gotten into biking!

For some reason, Rudy has decided that she likes bicycling. No cat knows the whole reason, but Rudy's kittens have reported that their mama has been playing a lot of cycling video games recently. If that was Rudy's inspiration, she's about to hit rock bottom. In the game, bikes can go fifty miles per hour up a hill, which is not the same in real life. Some cats are concerned that Rudy will get hurt biking, as some roads in Pawsville are still very icy.

Image above - Harvey, who would rather be pulled in a cart by a bicycle than ride one.

Mavis is very excited that Rudy has gotten into cycling, as she is a cyclist too. Mavis knows how to ride both a bike and a tricycle, and each of those skills can be useful in different situations. Rudy has been spending some time with Mavis, talking about the basics of biking. She seems excited to learn, but Rudy's intentions for learning cycling are still unknown.

Rudy is talking to us now about why she decided to try cycling, and to tell the truth, her inspiration wasn't the best. "I want to learn cycling because I realized how cool it is when I was playing a video game that included cycling. I'll be able to go so fast on a bike, and I won't even need a car! I don't think cars can go fifty miles an hour uphill!" Now, cats are worried. If Rudy truly believes that she can go that fast up a hill, Mavis will need to show her how fast a bike can really go. You may be able to go fifty miles per hour if you are speeding down a hill, but going up one is a completely different story. Rudy is very disappointed, and she has been wondering if she really wants to learn cycling after all.

Cats in Pawsville are pretty satisfied with their cars, and no cat wants to learn cycling when they can get around with less effort in a car. Also, the roads are still a bit icy in places, which would be hazardous for a cyclist. Rudy has abandoned her hope of learning cycling as quickly as she got it, and many cats are thinking that it is for the best. But when summer comes, and cars are just too heated up inside, maybe cats' interests will spark up again.

"I would also much rather be pulled in a cart than ride a bike — there might be some valuables in the cart with me."

- NAYA

While cats think about how dangerous cycling could be at this time of year, The Wish for Fish is already doing well again. There was some good news about the owner, and the food is as great as ever. The commotion has died down, and a few cats have gone back to Taco caT. Still, business there is slow, and there's no way the mystery meat tacos will sell out again. That's a good thing, because even scientists in Pawsville can't tell exactly what "meat" is in the tacos.

Subscribe again for more on cycling!

Image above - Juliet, who was inspired by a motorcycling video game, but knows that this isn't the right time of year.