Pawsville wants to knock Harvey's house down!

You may have heard about this in a previous issue, but we'll say it again. Just outside Pawsville, a big housing complex and mall are being built. Cats are not happy with this, but it has kind of faded into the background for the past month-and-a-half. However, when Pawsville's board of construction told Harvey that his house was in the way of the construction and that it would have to be knocked down, this housing complex jumped up to be the top thing on many cats' minds.

Image above - Harvey, who is appalled at the very idea of knocking his house down.

Harvey does not want his house to be knocked down, as he has had so many good memories there. He remembered the huge pound cake that

North baked for him, movie nights in his therapy office, and the countless sugar cubes he had consumed. Harvey is not ready for his house to be knocked down, and other cats are angry that Pawsville would even suggest such a thing.

Kittens like Harvey, and they have decided to take matters into their own hands. When he woke up, Harvey noticed kittens patrolling the area outside his house, and there were other kittens building a fence around the property. There were many tents set up, as if the kittens planned to stay at Harvey's property for a while. Many kittens ditched school today to help out, and there are teams of attack kittens ready in case they need to defend Harvey's property from construction vehicles. But the only cats kittens have seen are parent cats, begging their kittens to come home or go to school. Kittens have not backed down, and no parent cat has been allowed to enter Harvey's property.

Harvey, Makenna, North, Smoke, and Reposado may be protected, but they are also locked in their own house. Kittens have boarded up the windows and jammed the doors so that no cat can get in or out. There are kittens watching all sides of the house, and it would be obvious if any cat inside the house tried to smash a window to get out. Kittens deliver rations through a special slot they drilled into the wall, even though there is already food in the house. Right now, Harvey is feeling more like a prisoner than someone under protection.

“I’m a top-class thief, and I can’t even sneak into Harvey’s property!”

- NAYA, WHO CAN'T BELIEVE THIS

Pawsville's board of construction has asked kittens to step down and let the adult cats handle this, but they have not. Kittens have fortified their fences, and they are building more fences to make it harder for any cats to enter the property. There are kittens posted at regular intervals, and there are kittens with water guns ready to drench anyone who gets close enough.
