Kittens and construction workers are still battling!

Right now, kittens and construction workers are still clashing over Harvey's property. Right now, many cats have forgotten what each side is fighting for, and are just interested in seeing the fight play out.

Attack kittens are charging at the construction workers, who are pushing them back with makeshift clubs. Dirt and water is raining down on the battle, courtesy of kittens with water guns and slingshots. However, the kittens are being driven back, and all but one of the makeshift fences have been destroyed. But kittens aren't ready to give in yet. Two more of Lunch's kittens have been fired from the Kittenpult, taking out a dozen workers between the two of them. But there are too many construction workers, and the kittens are being pushed back. There are still two dozen kittens and ten elite kitten guards in reserve, but that is it.

You may have just heard the term “elite kitten guard,” and you may be wondering why some kittens are called that. Well, it’s in the name. The kittens are elites, capable of fighting and beating ten other kittens by themselves, which makes them very good guards. There were a dozen guards to start, but two have joined the fighting and are mad powerhouses on the battlefield. If those kittens came in, they could change the tide of the war. But they are in reserve for a reason. When five construction workers tried to sneak around the back of Harvey’s property, two of the guards were dispatched to take care of them. Those workers, unconscious, would be used as ammunition for the Kittenpult.

Meanwhile, Harvey, North, Makenna, Smoke, and Reposado are hunkered down in their house. The windows and doors are boarded up, which means that they can’t see anything going on outside. But you can hear it. There are screams, battle cries, wails of pain, roars of anger, and occasionally, you will hear the thump of a blow striking home. This is not very enjoyable to listen to, and North is in his office playing video games with headphones on. It may not be the best pastime, but at least North can’t hear the battle sounds outside.
