
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Kittens are angry about not getting into Harvey's class!

As only ten kittens were accepted into Harvey's wrestling class, many kittens that were rejected are not happy about being left out. Stygian and Black, the two of Lunch's kittens who got in, are being pressured and threatened by their siblings to give up their spots. And when someone tells you that they will withhold all of your potato chips for a month, the natural feeling is wanting to do what they want you to.

Image above - Juliet, who hopes that this anger does not turn into violence.

Harvey had hoped that this wouldn't happen, and he is trying to console hurt and angry kittens with sugar cubes. This is not helping too much, and even the promise of smuggled artificial sweetener doesn't sound good.

Harvey is not having much luck bribing his way into a state of peace, and it will be up to kittens to calm themselves down. But Naya's kittens are doing the opposite of calming down. Naya has come back from wherever she was hiding, and she is helping her kittens organize a protest. It's funny — just a little bit ago kittens were trying to protect Harvey's house, but now most of them want to vandalize it.

The kittens who were accepted into Harvey's class have sworn to protect their master, and they are guarding Harvey's house right now. But ten kittens isn't going to be enough to stop the twenty kittens who are coming to protest. Also, it's hard and very disgusting to try and catch rotten fruit flung toward Harvey's house, and Harvey's students have abandoned their posts. Harvey just has to watch his house get vandalized from inside it, which is not very pleasant. But he has had an idea. He can save his house, because the kittens outside want him, not anything else. So if Harvey drove off in his Jeep, the kittens would chase him.

Harvey has made a break for his Jeep, with an umbrella to protect against rotten fruit, and he is driving off. Sure enough, kittens have made chase, and it looked like they were prepared for this. Kittens on bicycles pulled carts with rotten fruit in them, and there was a kitten in each cart who threw the projectiles. The street was getting defaced, as rotten fruit was piling up. Harvey's Jeep was pretty clean, but that may not be so for long.

“Why do I have so much rotten fruit? I buy fruit so I can let it rot for these purposes!”

- NAYA

Right now, Harvey just has to be ready to drive his car around for a long time to escape the kittens on his tail who want to bombard him with rotten fruit. However, Harvey is not sure how he will get gas, and that is a pretty big problem, as Harvey would have to get out of his Jeep for a while for a refill. He is hoping that the kittens will just leave, but that doesn't seem so likely.

Subscribe again for more on this cross-town chase!

Image above - Judy, who thinks that this would make a good movie and wants to recreate it so she can film it.