

---

CATS ILLUSTRATED

---

Kittens are protesting going back to school!

As some kittens feel that they did not get enough time to relax over Spring Break, they are protesting about having to go back to school right when it is over. Kittens have agreed that they want a second week of Spring Break, even if they have to fight for it.

Image above - Harvey, who would also enjoy a longer break.

---

Adult cats would not mind another break, but they aren't to the point where they would want to fight about it. Some adult cats don't even care, like Mavis, who didn't change her routine at all during Spring Break. However, some cats, like Lunch, think that they deserve more of a break from working. Lunch has spent countless hours at her luncheon, and it was so relaxing just to not work while it was closed over Spring Break. But Lunch isn't going to contact that district superintendent and demand another week off from school, as she would rather leave the hard job to the kittens.

Kittens spent some of yesterday and all of today making signs and coming up with campaign slogans. However, we're not sure how well adult cats will listen if they hear the slogan "A week off from school or your head's in a pool!" This may require the help of adult cats, but so far, kittens are on their own. But this may be easier than they thought. Even though the school wants to stick to the curriculum, even teachers could use another week off. Only the principal and a few other high-level cats think that the school should open like normal, and they are not popular by any standard right now.

Even though all cats would enjoy another week off from break, parent cats and teachers agree that kittens need to continue their learning. Kittens have seen this as an act of betrayal, and they have convinced themselves that they are against the whole world in the fight for time off from school. Today, kittens bought their own dinners, and they are determined to care for themselves without parental help. Though they are concerned about this, parent cats know that it won't last long. Lunch's kittens came home for dessert, and they have decided that it will be easier to accept the care of their parents.

"More Spring Break! More Spring Break! More Spring Break or you'll get bitten by a snake!"

- MAVIS'S KITTENS, WHO ARE STILL COMING UP WITH CHANTS

Though the fight for a longer break will probably not succeed, kittens are still hoping that their pleas will be heard. And if kittens get another week off from school, they may go on another trip, which would be fun. However, the cats in power are very resolute about kittens continuing their learning, and it looks like kittens will be going back to school after all. But cats are still hoping, as that's all you can do in this situation.

Subscribe again for a Spring Break decision!

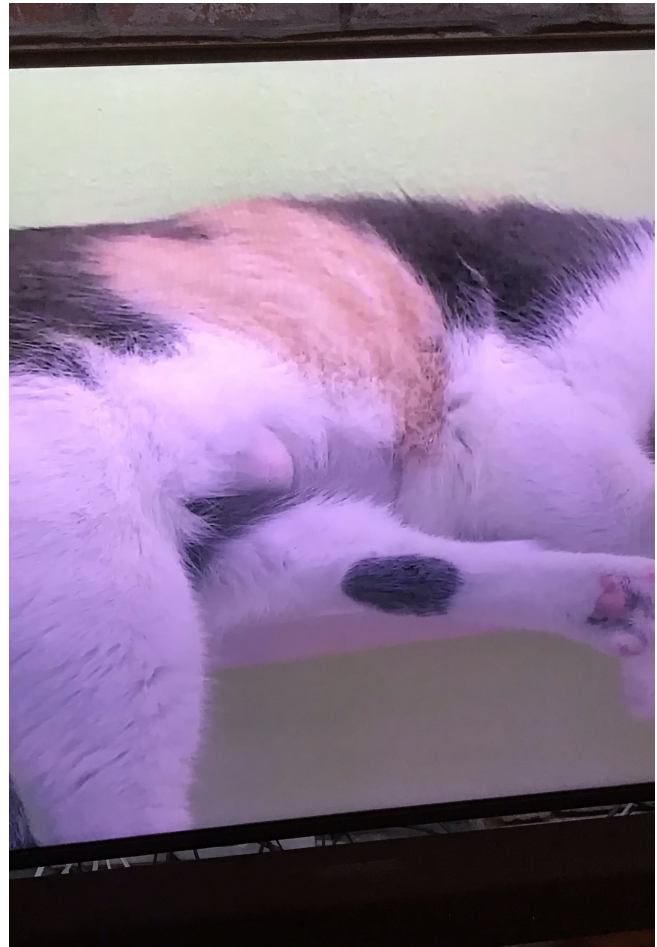

Image above - Juliet, who knows that her kittens will be there for their after-dinner video games.