Lunch's Luncheon is losing popularity!

Recently, Lunch has noticed that her luncheon is losing popularity. Yesterday, there were only three cats there for Lunchtime, and one of them was Harvey. Cats are concerned, because they do not want Lunch's Luncheon to close.

Kittens do enjoy Lunch's Luncheon's milkshakes, and to show support, a large group of kittens came in and ordered milkshakes. This was good business for Lunch, but she couldn't make them anytime soon as her supply of milk and ice cream was very low. However, Lunch may take a different approach than selling milkshakes to kittens to get business. She has been thinking of ideas, and judging by her expression, we think she has thought of something good (we're not spying, just recording her actions).

Now, it looks like Lunch is going to try and get an ad in a newspaper. This will cost a lot, and Lunch should probably just pay for one small ad and see how it goes. But it is a good idea, and it seems like an ad could work to give her luncheon more business. However, Lunch is not a cat who sits around while waiting for something to happen. She must have had another idea for advertising, too. This was proven when Lunch asked her kittens if they would advertise her luncheon at their school. Lunch's kittens agreed when Lunch told them she would pay them a dollar for every kitten they convinced to come to her luncheon. Personally, I think a more fair wage would be something like five dollars an hour, but Lunch can do what she wants.

As they want to support Lunch's Luncheon, adult cats have started taking their kittens there more. This is also good business for Lunch, but she doesn't want to ask adult cats to keep coming just to support her. She wants new customers to come, not just cats she knows. This is fair, and adult cats have taken no offense. However, some cats are trying to support Lunch too much.

“A Gigantaburger is nearly three pounds - that's a third of Wilbur Spots's weight!”

- BLACKPELT, WHO'S WORRIED

Harvey ate sugar fries until he ran outside with a paw to his muzzle, and Wilbur Spots tried to finish a whole Gigantaburger on his own (the name says it all).

Even though her Luncheon has not been as popular recently, Lunch is still determined to get more business. She does not want to have to fire her employees because she cannot pay them, and of course, Lunch loves her luncheon, and does not want it to close. Cats are supporting her, and hopefully, things will all be okay in the end. For Wilbur Spots and Harvey too, who are still feeling sick.
