
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Kittens have been eating too much candy!

As they have tons of leftover candy from Easter, kittens have been eating a lot of it while playing video games in their rooms. Adult cats are worried, and for good reason. Kittens have started to look sick, and they aren't hungry for dinner anymore.

Yesterday, Lunch saw three of her kittens stumbling around the house like they were drunk, and followed them back to their room. Inside, the floor was literally covered in candy wrappers. Between the six of them, Lunch's kittens had eaten nearly seventy pieces of candy. However, Lunch wasn't the only cat to make a startling discovery. Stripy found out that her kittens had eaten more than half of their candy, at least fifteen pieces each. Other parent cats are making startling discoveries as well, and this candy fest needs to be put to a stop.

Image above - Juliet, whose kittens looked very nauseous and dizzy when she saw them today.

At first, cats tried to confiscate candy. Rudy tried to sneak into her kittens' room and take away their candy stash, but her kittens came back from the bathroom at the moment Rudy was stalking through their room. She was thrown out roughly, and the door was locked. Other adult cats haven't had very good luck, either. Juliet high-tailed it out of her kittens' room to avoid a beating, and Lunch got a shove out and a door slammed in her face. Mere confiscation wouldn't work. But then, Stripy had an idea. She shut off the power to her house, and soon enough, her kittens came out of their room to ask her to turn it back on. Stripy made her kittens promise to turn over their candy so she could keep it safe, and her kittens agreed, as long as Stripy turned the power back on. It was an ingenious solution.

Image above - Judy, whose kittens are very responsible with their candy, unlike other kittens.

However, kittens are still reeling from their sugar intake. Lunch's kittens were in the bathroom throwing up, and Juliet's kittens were lying on their living room couch, trying to forget their nausea. Adult cats have started to say "I told you so" to their sick kittens, which has made them feel better after getting rough treatment from their kittens. Still, it will take kittens a while to recover, and maybe they'll even agree that the experience wasn't worth it. But then again, probably not.

"You can always pay me to lighten your kittens' candy load!"

- NAYA, WHO HAS ACTUALLY TEMPTED SOME ADULT CATS

Next year, adult cats are going to be very careful about how they let their kittens keep their candy. But the next big candy fest will be Halloween, which is still a long way off. Unfortunately for adult cats, Halloween is famous for its candy, and it may not be so easy to get kittens to give theirs up to adult cats, who will probably snatch a couple pieces for themselves.

Subscribe again for more on candy problems!