

---

CATS ILLUSTRATED

---

Pawsville has been getting warm weather!

As it is Spring, the weather in Pawsville is starting to warm up. Yesterday, the high temperature was seventy-two degrees, and even though that is not hot at all, cats were sweating. The last traces of snow melted a long time ago, and now the heat of spring is next up on the endurance list.

Image above - Lunch, who is not used to seventy-degree days after a long winter.

---

Rudy is thinking about filling her pool so she can swim in it, but that would take a long time and the water would take a while to heat up before she could go in. Many cats have been going to the town pool instead, though there is a long wait to get in and most cats cannot stand the humidity of the town pool while waiting. However, some cats in Pawsville are affected less by the heat, while others take more of a hit. “This heat is unbearable,” says Harvey, who has a very thick fur coat, “I can’t even imagine what summer will be like, this is too much already!” Harvey has raided North’s soda stash for cold drinks, and he is only eating sugar cubes that have been chilled for five hours or more.

But unlike Harvey, some cats don’t notice the heat at all. Mavis and her kittens were the only cats in Pawsville who didn’t go to the convenience store to buy a cold soda. Mavis believes that heat is an illusion and that she will not be tricked by it into doing anything. Her kittens are invulnerable to the heat because they compare it to worse things, like an eight-hour ritual, and they feel better about their situation. This seems like it wouldn’t work, but for Mavis’s kittens, it works just fine. In fact, Mavis’s kittens are selling their cold drinks for twenty-five dollars a piece, and they are doing better than Naya, who got some drinks to sell but kept them all for herself in the end.

Image above - Harvey, who would jump in a bucket of ice to escape the heat.

Pawsville is a town of extreme temperatures, and cats know that in the summer, Pawsville can hit temperatures as high as ninety-five degrees. A seventy-degree day will feel cool once summer is in full swing, and that is what is scaring cats the most. Right now, heaters are being exchanged for air conditioners, and cats are buying up cold drinks to prepare for the hot days ahead. By this reaction to a seventy-degree day, we have means to believe that cats will be in deep trouble once summer arrives.

“We will also start selling buckets of ice!”

- MAVIS’S KITTENS, WHO HAVE CORNERED THE MARKET FOR COLD THINGS

This wave of normal temperatures is a shock to cats who are used to winter weather, and unfortunately, there will be a lot more warm weather to come. The rainy season is over, and in its place is Spring, which will transition to Summer, the hottest season of the year.

Subscribe again for more on high temperatures!