
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Candy is going bad in kittens' stashes!

As it has been exposed to hot temperatures, and it is pretty old in general, some Easter candy in kittens' stashes has started to go bad. The chocolates had melted to their wrappers and smelled funny, and most gummies were a single blob in their bags.

Image above - Judy, who thought that candy lasted longer.

Kittens are unhappy that their candy is going bad, but adult cats are thrilled. They have been waiting for the chance to lighten their kittens' candy loads, and this meant that they wouldn't even have to do it. However, no adult cat is going to voice this to their sulking kittens, as they know when to keep their mouths shut. But some kittens have seen this spoiling in a completely different way. Mavis's kittens think that it is an omen that they should be eating things like popsicles for dessert, not candy. The season is changing, and so should kittens' treat diets. This is kind of backfiring on adult cats, as there are enough popsicles at the grocery store to feed a crowd.

Ever since Lunch's Luncheon changed its menu, some adult cats have been thinking about how maybe they should change what they are eating, too. Today, Blackpelt proposed the idea to Juliet that he make chilled soup instead of meatloaf for dinner, which really heated up the kitchen in the cooking process. He tried it out today, though from Juliet and her kittens' reaction, Blackpelt might need to refine his recipe slightly before he makes it again. Still, Blackpelt's idea has caught on with other cats, and they are trying different things too. North came up with the clever solution to put any food in the freezer after making it to chill it, which he has tried with many things, including pasta.

Image above - Rudy, who's happy that Lunch's Luncheon still serves milkshakes.

Lunch is happy that her idea has caught on with other cats, and her luncheon is doing well too. The new menu has attracted cats who weren't necessarily fans of fried food, as almost all of the new menu is not fried. However, there are some cats, like Harvey, who would like to see some fried items come back on the menu eventually, like sugar fries.

"Ice cream is coming into season!"

- JULIET, WHO'S EXCITED

there, whether they serve cold food or not, even if the temperature outside is ninety degrees.

The seasons are changing, and for cats, that means that diets will too. The age of fried food is over, at least temporarily, and it is being replaced with cold foods, or foods that were made hot but frozen. However, this change has not affected all restaurants, and The Wish for Fish has not changed its menu at all. But it didn't really need to, because cats will come

Subscribe again for more diet changes!