

---

CATS ILLUSTRATED

---

Kittens need to get more shots!

As there has been a COVID-19 booster shot approved for kittens, adult cats have been scheduling appointments for their kittens to get their shots. Though COVID-19 is not at large anymore for cats, it is still important to be fully protected.

Image above - Juliet and her kittens, who don't like shots. At all.

---

In addition, there is a second booster shot for adult cats now. This has put the feeling of dread into cats' lives, as they are not looking forward to another shot. However, they are doing it to protect themselves and their kittens from COVID-19, and many cats have used that resolve to make themselves get into the car and drive to the shot clinic. Lunch got her shot yesterday, and she is feeling much better after it. Her foreleg hurts in the spot of the shot, and she is feeling slightly sick, but Lunch is extremely happy to get that shot done with. Other adult cats are trying to convince themselves to get shots, because then it will be done with and they won't have to worry.

Kittens have been getting creative in finding ways to try and convince their parents that they don't need a shot. Juliet's kittens stuck bandaids on themselves and told Juliet that they had gotten shots without help. However, while his siblings stuck their bandaids on their forelegs, Wilbur Spots stuck his on his stomach. This blew the cover of Juliet's kittens, and Wilbur Spots is not popular right now. But that isn't the only way that kittens are trying to dupe adult cats. Rudy, who relies on her to-do list more than her memory, saw that "take kittens to get shots" was crossed off, marking it as done. Her kittens had also put on bandaids, in the right place, and it would have been perfect if Blackspots hadn't just come back with the car that Rudy's kittens said they took this morning. Blackspots, unknowing, is also not very popular right now, as he blew the cover of his own kittens.

Image above - Judy, who is going to get her shot after one of her kittens gets one and says it was okay.

North and Harvey are also getting their shots, which is even more important for Harvey as he is older. They did not have a terrible experience, though Harvey had to put a sugar cube in his mouth during the shot to stop from jerking around. The clinic staff even let Harvey pick out a lollipop to take home. This is one of the only times that Harvey has visited the hospital, but if he knows that they serve ice cream there as a meal, North should keep a lookout for faked injuries.

"Can I be sedated before my shot?"

- NAYA, WHO IS SURPRISINGLY SCARED OF NEEDLES

Shots are nothing to celebrate, and cats are not looking forward to getting them. However, once they are done, everything feels a lot better.

Subscribe again for more on booster shots!