
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Yearbooks are coming out for kittens!

As it is the end of the year, kittens at school have been getting their yearbooks. This is a very fun time of year for most kittens, as getting yearbooks is a sign that school will be over soon. Also, kittens love reading the superlatives in the yearbooks, as they can spark last-minute gossip.

For cats, superlatives are a very large part of yearbooks. However, for those of you who do not know what superlatives are, we can tell you that they are titles that graduating kittens vote for their peers on. And while most kittens are not graduating, it is fun to see what other kittens got as superlatives. Still, most kittens are waiting impatiently until the year they graduate so they can get a superlative, or at least have a chance to get one. But not all superlatives are good. In fact, many adult cats are in conflict about whether superlatives are a good thing or not.

Image above - Juliet and her kittens, who love looking at the superlatives section in the yearbooks.

“I think that superlatives are a great way for kittens to have a last laugh before graduation,” says Harvey, “I know that I have good memories of superlatives when I was a kitten. When I graduated middle school, I was named ‘most mischievous!’” However, Lunch opposes superlatives quite strongly. “I think that superlatives should be banned,” says Lunch, “they aren’t all good, you know. I was voted ‘most likely to skip college.’” But Lunch’s argument may not be that strong, as she had been telling her classmates that year that she planned to skip college and open a luncheon. The latter did happen, but Lunch went to college first.

Many adult cats are recalling the superlatives they got when they graduated from middle school. Mavis had been voted “most attached to a certain food (cabbage),” Juliet had been voted “least likely to get married,” and Naya had been voted, “most likely to end up in jail.” Even though these might not have been the most supportive superlatives, Mavis, Juliet, and Naya were proud to get them.

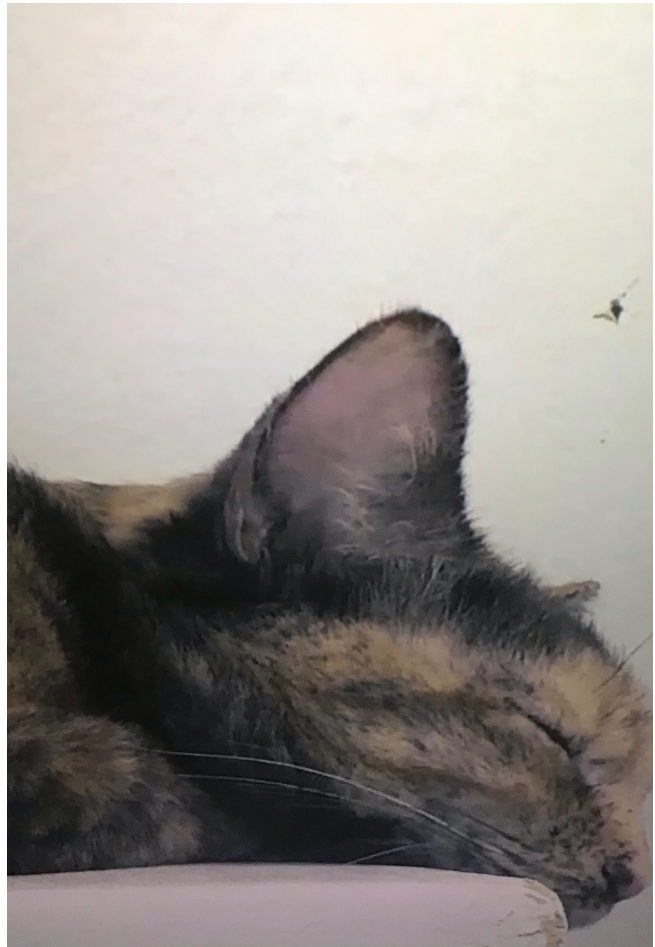

Image above - Judy, who thinks that Naya's superlative is the most accurate one so far.

“I was voted ‘most likely to get into a fight,’ though that’s because of Judy.”

- RUDY, WHO AGREES WITH HER SUPERLATIVE

At school, some kittens have been making last-minute efforts to get certain superlatives. One in particular has caused problems, “most likely to end up in jail.” In fact, the school has announced that they are canceling superlatives this year for kittens, before things get too crazy or something breaks. I mean, kittens have to show that they are very troublesome if they are going to get the superlative “most likely to end up in jail,” which is not something the school wants to happen.

Subscribe again for more on yearbooks!