
CATS ILLUSTRATED

Parent cats want their kittens to try sports!

It is summer break right now for kittens, and parent cats have been thinking about their hopes for their kittens. Because of this, many kittens have been pressured to try sports.

At their first impression, kittens have decided that they don't want to try sports at all. You get sweaty and smelly playing them, which is not pleasant. However, adult cats have said that they would cut down on video games if their kittens didn't give sports a try at least. This feels like blackmail to most kittens, but they have reluctantly signed up for different sports activities. And today, when kittens actually went to their sports classes, they got their second impression of sports. Kittens did not like sports. Parent cats are disappointed, but they aren't giving up quite yet. Maybe kittens just didn't find the right sport for them. It could just take a better match, and then kittens will be playing sports as enthusiastically as they play video games!

Image above - Juliet, who thinks that sports could be good for her kittens.

Kittens are not happy about this situation at all. They have been weighing whether it is worth it to give sports a good try to make their parents happy, or to go into complete refusal and risk losing their video game console. It is a very tough dilemma, and kittens will be mulling it over tonight. Some kittens are thinking that they could hide their video game console beforehand so their parents couldn't find it to confiscate it. However, that would risk getting a look of disappointment or other worse punishments for evading authority. But sports are just as bad, and most kittens just end up tripping over themselves and getting hit in the face by balls.

Harvey has been talking about the days when he was a kitten, where sports were even more enforced as a practice. However, missing a leg is an excellent excuse for not being able to play sports, and Harvey was used to relaxing while his friends were forced to play sports all day. Maybe that wasn't the best thing to say to kittens, as Harvey has associated missing a leg with not having to play sports, which is not a good connection for kittens to make.

“Some kittens may dominate the sports fields, but they have no power in the streets.”

- NAYA'S KITTENS

kittens who the boss is, which is a bad first influence.

Subscribe again for more on sports!

Image above - Rudy, who can't believe that she will have to keep a lookout for leg-severing attempts.

Kittens are not happy about being forced into sports, but their parents are adamant. Hopefully, their suffering will be obvious, and in the end, maybe they could just be left alone in their rooms to play all of the video games that they want. But until then, kittens will have to sit through sports, which is not very fun at all. The more advanced kittens love to show new